
Higher Education in the Year 2025

Narendra K. Rustagi, Howard University

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Making a prediction about the future of higher education even at the end of the decade would be a major stretch as it is difficult to predict the technological changes that a country would embrace, political policies in a country and the impact that they have in light of whatever else is going on around the world. Education was once seen as a means of inculcating civic and social duties, a process of promotion of social efficiency and the preservation and spread of national culture. Education is, of course, necessary for the growth of individuals. In the future, the education sector may have facilitators of education with technology, certification bodies where brand of university counts and also agencies responsible for maintaining set standards of delivery of education, along with traditional brick and mortar universities.
